Feeling flat

Key points

- Both headline business confidence and firms’ views of their own activity were steady in October at low levels, up 1 point and down 1 point respectively.
- Employment intentions lifted 1 point, profit expectations declined 2 points, and investment intentions bounced 6 points but remained negative.
- Both residential and commercial construction intentions dropped sharply.

In the October ANZ Business Outlook Survey headline business confidence lifted 1 point to a net 37% of respondents reporting they expect general business conditions to deteriorate in the year ahead.

Firms’ perceptions of their own activity prospects eased 1 point to a net 7% expecting an improvement, a weak level. The retail sector bounced 5 points but remains the least positive (-8%), while manufacturing is now the most optimistic sector (up 9 to +16%), perhaps reflecting the weaker NZD.

Turning to the detail:

- A net 3% of firms are expecting to reduce investment, up 6.
- Employment intentions remain subdued, up 1 point to a net 0% of firms expecting to lift employment.
- Profit expectations fell 2 points to -15%. Profit expectations in the agriculture sector have dropped sharply in the past two months despite the weaker NZD; this is now the weakest sector at -54% (down 23 points). The services sector remains the least pessimistic about profit, at a net -4%.
- A net 31% of businesses expect it to be tougher to get credit, up 2.
- Firms’ pricing intentions lifted 2 points to +32%, the highest level since early-2014. This likely reflects rising costs such as wages, transport, and imported goods. Inflation expectations lifted 0.1% pts to 2.2%.
- Construction intentions dropped sharply. Residential construction intentions dropped 19 points to +5%, while commercial intentions fell 20 points to -24%.
This month we take a closer look at construction intentions. While it has become less clear that residential construction intentions lead residential consents, the downward trend certainly doesn’t suggest consent growth is about to take off.

Commercial construction is lumpy and no indicator is going to match it closely, but the ongoing fall in surveyed construction intentions suggests downside risk.

Note: the last data point is the October month
By region, it’s a similar story for both commercial and residential construction: Canterbury is the most pessimistic (though commercial has bounced somewhat). Construction intentions in Wellington are the strongest but are trending downward, while Auckland intentions seem to have found a floor. (Note the charts are 3-month averages).

Outside of the decline in construction intentions, most indicators were little changed in the October Business Outlook survey. It’s clear that business sentiment is not a tailwind for the economy at present, but we remain optimistic that the boost being provided by a strong labour market, still-high commodity prices, a fiscal boost and now a significantly lower NZD will keep things ticking along.

The Reserve Bank argued in the August Monetary Policy Statement that ticking along wasn’t going to do the job, in terms of getting CPI inflation sustainably back to target. We therefore continue to believe that while the impacts of higher wage growth, higher oil prices, and the weaker currency certainly mean there’s no hurry, it remains the case that an eventual OCR cut is more likely than a hike.
