This is the final release of the Monthly Inflation Gauge. We will continue to monitor key prices from the gauge internally and use these to inform our CPI forecasts and views.

Downside

Summary

The ANZ Monthly Inflation Gauge lifted 0.3% m/m in June. This saw the Gauge contract -0.5% q/q, suggesting some downside risk to our Q2 non-tradable CPI pick of 0.0% (out Thursday). Annual inflation in the Gauge shed another 0.4%pts, now running at 2.4% y/y.¹

Key points

- Cultural services lifted sharply (4.7%) as some attractions (such as zoos) went from being free to changing back to usual entry fees. Housing-related prices also remained robust.
- The q/q signal is perhaps more relevant, given Q2 CPI is out Thursday. And the 0.5% q/q contraction in the Gauge suggests there's downside risk to our pick of 0.0% q/q for non-tradable inflation. However, it's fair to say that we may not have matched Statistics NZ's price collection and interpolation methodologies perfectly. Lockdown has created challenges.
- But based on our own monitoring, free public transport prices during lockdown (some buses and rail) deducted 0.5%pts from quarterly inflation in the Gauge (down 39% and 81% q/q respectively). Rents provided the largest offset (0.2% pts) rising 1% q/q.
- Annual inflation in our underlying gauge excluding housing decelerated another 0.3%pts to just 0.6% y/y – that could be a sign of things to come for headline inflation if the housing market softens as we expect and as rent freezes and fewer visitor arrivals keep rents contained.
- Lockdown-related noise in these data continued in June. From a quarterly inflation perspective, this isn't expected to come out of the wash until Q4. By then we expect the inflation pulse will have weakened further with weak global inflation, an elevated NZD, low inflation expectations, and weaker household incomes coming together to keep price rises in check. The RBNZ certainly has its work cut out.
