RBNZ Monetary Policy Review

6 October 2021

Lift off into a stormy flight path

Summary

• As expected, the RBNZ raised the Official Cash Rate (OCR) 25bp to 0.50% today. The tone acknowledged downside risks and concentrated lockdown pain, but emphasised the robustness of the medium-term outlook.

ANZ

- Risks around growth (particularly near term) are to the downside, but inflation risks are to the upside. That's awkward and a global theme.
- Our OCR forecast continues to be follow-up hikes in November and February, and then a cautious series of hikes taking the OCR to 1.5% by August next year.
- As has been the case for some time, the risks are skewed towards something coming along to derail the RBNZ's hiking cycle before its completion, despite extremely strong inflation pressures.

One under the belt

Today's Review can be summed up in one quote:

"The current COVID-19-related restrictions have not materially changed the medium-term outlook for inflation and employment since the August Statement."

We could leave it there, really. But for those interested in a little more nuance, the RBNZ noted that the reasons for this were

- household and business balance sheet strength;
- ongoing fiscal policy support; and
- the strong terms of trade.

Robust business sentiment was noted, as well as the vigorous bounce that followed restrictions last time. In this environment, "immediate relative price shocks risk leading to more generalised price rises."

The RBNZ could have sounded more 'dovish' today. The pain Auckland businesses are going through warranted a mention, but clearly isn't seen as significant enough to derail momentum. There are other downside risks than just the local COVID outbreak, with the downside risks to global growth also mentioned. We concur. Global risk appetite is also looking wobblier, and this could have implications for things like funding costs and confidence. Indeed, global risks, along with the COVID outbreak and the potential for a harderthan-intended landing in the housing market, is why the risks in our view are skewed towards the RBNZ simply running out of runway before completing their hiking cycle, despite what are very strong inflation pressures.

But the fact that COVID is, on net, inflationary was highlighted:

"With regard to the stance of monetary policy, the Committee noted that the current restrictions are creating a different set of policy challenges than in 2020. Demand shortfalls are less of an issue than the economy hitting capacity constraints given the effectiveness of Government support and resilience of household and business balance sheets. While some capacity bottlenecks are likely to be short term, there is a risk that these become more persistent as we transition to a COVID-19 endemic state of the world."

That sets the bar high for not continuing with hikes through this outbreak as long as momentum appears robust.

The RBNZ had to hike today: following the August pause they pretty much said that they'd be hiking today unless the Earth was hit by a meteorite. Not delivering today would likely have caused market pricing for any future hikes at all to collapse, potentially leading to unwelcome lower mortgage rates. It also would have led to accusations of "crying wolf". But as it happens, strategic considerations probably hardly got a look in. This was a more 'hawkish' tone than it could have been, and very much suggests that the RBNZ found this to be a very straightforward decision.

Our OCR forecast is unchanged; we continue to expect follow-up 25bp hikes in November, February, May and August, taking the OCR to 1.5%. But the world remains an uncertain place, and as the COVID outbreak drags on and probably spreads, future hikes may not be such a slam dunk. We can't rule out that a more sustained hit to sentiment and confidence could be in the pipeline. But the RBNZ is going to keep going until they see the whites of the eyes of declining inflation pressures, and that seems a distant prospect here and now.

In short, the COVID outbreak must make a follow-up November hike a much less certain proposition than otherwise. But there wasn't much acknowledgement of that by the RBNZ today, and a follow-up hike remains firmly odds on.

Market reaction

Short-end rates popped a few points higher initially, which is logical given that the hike wasn't completely priced in. Today's commentary had a more certain tone to it than it might have, but the RBNZ gave themselves sufficient wiggle room to adapt to the situation as it evolves.

By 2.30pm markets had moved to price in the OCR reaching 1.24% by May. That's almost identical to our forecast (we expect it to be at 1.25% by then), but a lot still needs to go right for those hikes to be delivered and as such, we see the risks for short-end interest rates as biased mildly to the downside following today's reaction. In particular, the COVID outbreak seems likely to get worse before it gets better.

FX markets reacted quickly, with the Kiwi spiking around 25bps higher before retreating lower. Today's OCR increase puts another 25bps of carry on the table for the NZD. That may not sound like much, but it is important against currencies like EUR and JPY, where cash rates are still negative and likely to remain that way for some time. However, if we do see forward expectations for the OCR adjust lower over coming weeks, that could begin to weigh on the NZD, especially against currencies like the USD and GBP, with the Fed and BoE both inching close to withdrawing stimulus.

Monetary Stimulus Further Reduced – Official Cash rate raised to 0.50 percent

The Monetary Policy Committee agreed to increase the Official Cash Rate (OCR) to 0.50 per cent. Consistent with their assessment at the time of the August Statement, it is appropriate to continue reducing the level of monetary stimulus so as to maintain low inflation and support maximum sustainable employment.

The level of global economic activity has continued to recover, supported by accommodative monetary and fiscal settings, and rising vaccination rates enabling a relaxation of mobility restrictions. While economic uncertainty remains elevated due to the prevalent impact of COVID-19, cost pressures are becoming more persistent and some central banks have started the process of reducing monetary policy stimulus.

New Zealand's public health settings are also evolving as domestic vaccination rates rise. The higher the vaccination rate, the less virus-related disruption there will be to New Zealand's economic activity over coming years.

The current COVID-19-related restrictions have not materially changed the medium-term outlook for inflation and employment since the August Statement. Capacity pressures remain evident in the economy, particularly in the labour market. A broad range of economic indicators highlight that the New Zealand economy has been performing strongly in aggregate.

While the economy contracted sharply during the recent nationwide healthrelated lockdown, household and business balance sheet strength, ongoing fiscal policy support, and a strong terms of trade provide confidence that economic activity will recover quickly as alert level restrictions ease. Recent economic indicators support this picture.

However, the Committee is aware that the latest COVID-19 restrictions have badly affected some businesses in Auckland and a range of service industries more broadly. There will be longer-term implications for economic activity both domestically and internationally from the pandemic.

Headline CPI inflation is expected to increase above 4 percent in the near term before returning towards the 2 percent midpoint over the medium term. The near-term rise in inflation is accentuated by higher oil prices, rising transport costs and the impact of supply shortfalls. These immediate relative price shocks risk leading to more generalised price rises. At this time, measures of core inflation and medium-term inflation expectations remain close to 2 percent.

The Committee noted that further removal of monetary policy stimulus is expected over time, with future moves contingent on the medium-term outlook for inflation and employment.

Summary Record of Meeting

The Monetary Policy Committee discussed economic developments since the August Statement. The Committee noted that the level of global economic activity has continued to recover, supported by rising COVID-19 vaccination rates in many countries, a gradual relaxation of mobility restrictions, and continued monetary and fiscal support. However the near-term outlook for global growth has weakened somewhat due to the spread of the Delta variant, fuel shortages, and rising risks to the Chinese economy. Considerable uncertainty exists regarding the longer-run economic impacts of COVID-19.

Global inflation has increased due to ongoing supply bottlenecks, resulting in higher costs. These supply disruptions and labour shortages are affecting productive capacity. At the same time demand is recovering causing pressure on prices. Global inflation has also been pushed higher in the nearterm by rising energy prices. In part this reflects transition costs associated with climate change. In response to signs that inflation pressures are becoming more persistent, some central banks have started the process of reducing monetary policy stimulus.

The Committee noted that recent domestic economic data suggest that prior to the country re-entering lockdown in August, the New Zealand economy was starting from a strong aggregate position, and capacity pressures were building. The economy is expected to have contracted sharply as a result of the recent COVID-related restrictions, although by less than the first national lockdown in the second quarter of 2020.

The Committee noted that near-term growth will remain volatile, and will depend on the speed and extent to which public health restrictions are eased. However, the experience of last year suggests that timely Government support for business and jobs is effective at cushioning the near-term impact on economic activity.

Early data suggest that business and consumer confidence remained robust during the latest lockdown. Some customer-facing businesses in Auckland and a range of service sectors are experiencing more acute stress. Reflecting the tightness of the labour market, firms have sought to hold on to employees, in some cases supported by wage subsidies. Employment opportunities appear to have remained firm.

As in the global economy, rising demand alongside capacity constraints is contributing to higher domestic inflation. Cost pressure in New Zealand has been accentuated in the near term by higher oil prices, supply shortfalls and rising transport costs. This is expected to result in CPI inflation rising above 4 percent in the near term, before returning towards the 2 percent midpoint of the target band over the medium term. Core inflation remains near the target mid-point.

The Committee noted significant uncertainty about how changes to public health settings, border restrictions, and rising incidence of COVID-19 in the community will impact on economic outcomes as the response to the pandemic evolves. Achieving high vaccination rates will be crucial to reducing the ongoing disruption that COVID-19 has on people and the economy.

The Committee agreed that there will be longer-term implications for economic activity both domestically and internationally from the pandemic. The Committee will be watching closely how the economy adjusts to the ongoing disruption from endemic COVID-19 and the balance of pressure on demand and supply.

As required by their Remit, members assessed the impact of monetary policy on the Government's objective to support more sustainable house prices. The Committee noted the Reserve Bank's assessment is that the level of house prices is currently unsustainable. Members noted that a number of factors are expected to constrain house prices over the medium term. These include a high rate of house building, slower population growth, changes to tax settings, and tighter bank lending rules. Rising mortgage interest rates, as monetary stimulus is reduced, would also constrain house prices to a more sustainable level. Members noted a risk that any continued near-term price growth could lead to sharper falls in house prices in the future.

With regard to the stance of monetary policy, the Committee noted that the current restrictions are creating a different set of policy challenges than in 2020. Demand shortfalls are less of an issue than the economy hitting capacity constraints given the effectiveness of Government support and resilience of household and business balance sheets. While some capacity bottlenecks are likely to be short term, there is a risk that these become more persistent as we transition to a COVID-19 endemic state of the world.

The Committee agreed that rising capacity pressures would feed through into inflation. Employment is expected to remain at around its maximum sustainable level. Members concluded that monetary policy stimulus will need to be reduced to maintain price stability and maximum sustainable employment over the medium term.

The Committee agreed to further reduce the level of monetary stimulus at this meeting by increasing the Official Cash Rate (OCR) to 0.5 percent. The Committee noted that further removal of monetary policy stimulus is expected over time, with future moves contingent on the medium-term outlook for inflation and employment.

On Wednesday 6 October, the Committee reached a consensus to increase the OCR to 0.5 percent.
