Adjusting for inflation

Key points

- Consumer confidence fell 1.8 points in June to 80.5, a touch above its record low, but still deep within the "something to worry about" zone.
- The proportion of people who believe it is a good time to buy a major household item, the best indicator for spending, bounced 9 points to -21. That's a decent bounce, but it's too early to call this a recovery. This indicator is still dire in an absolute sense.
- Inflation expectations reversed last month's decline, up from 5.1% to 5.6%. Clearly, the RBNZ's war on inflation isn't won yet.

The ANZ-Roy Morgan Consumer Confidence Index fell 1.8 points in June. Households are dealing with a lot right now: incomes not keeping up with inflation, lifting interest rates, falling house and other asset prices, and ongoing COVID and general economic uncertainty. The good news: with the labour market so tight, job security is still looking good.

Turning to the detail:

- Perceptions of current personal financial situations fell 5 points to -22%.
- A net 3% expect to be worse off this time next year, down 2 points. It's very unusual for this series to be negative.
- Households continue to think it's a bad time to buy a major household item, but there was some improvement in June, up 9 points to -21. In an absolute sense, this is extremely low, and worrying for retailers.
- Perceptions regarding the next year's economic outlook deteriorated to -47%. The five-year measure pared gains made in May, back at -5%.
- House price inflation expectations lifted from 1.1% to 1.4%. Still low.
- CPI inflation expectations lifted 0.5%pts to 5.6%, fully reversing last month's decline.

Overall, these data are sending sobering signals about the outlook. In particular, retail spending could soon find itself on the ropes if consumers follow through with their stated answers to the question of whether it is a good time to buy a major household item. So far, spending has been holding up (figure 2), but this is an ominous sign for retailers nonetheless.

Stepping back, however, economic fundamentals aren't all weak by any means. The labour market is extremely tight, and that'll be supporting consumers' perceptions of job security. That's a very different scenario to, say, the Global Financial Crisis, where job losses were front of mind. Indeed, we think sky-high inflation (necessities in particular) are a leading cause for very weak consumer confidence at present (see figure 3). While the higher cost of living will require some belt tightening, there is still light at the end of the tunnel, provided the labour market broadly holds it together as the RBNZ tames inflation. Being worried your income isn't going as far is very different from worrying that your income might be about to stop.

On the inflation front, these data suggest the RBNZ still has work to do. Inflation expectations are too high. Failure to get on top of inflation expectations would risk a nasty combo of persistently high inflation, weak activity, and lifting unemployment. Accordingly, we expect two more 50point hikes (July and August), before the RBNZ enters a more datadependent and gradual path of monetary tightening.

Our confidence composite gauge combines lagged Business Outlook expectations and intentions with consumer sentiment (figure 4). Still at recessionary levels, it continues to highlight downside risks to the outlook.
