Mortgage holders holding back

Key points

- Consumer confidence lifted 3 points in August to 85.4.
- The proportion of people who believe it is a good time to buy a major household item, the best indicator for retail spending, lifted 8 points to -17, its highest read since January (though still very low). A gap is emerging in this indicator between those with mortgages and those without.
- Inflation expectations were little changed at 5.0%, versus 4.9% last month.

The ANZ-Roy Morgan Consumer Confidence Index lifted a little in August but remains at very subdued levels. Households are not happy about higher living costs and with interest rates rising rapidly, are understandably concerned about the economic outlook. Homeowners are seeing the value of their largest asset going backwards. However, offsetting all that to some extent, in a super-tight labour market incomes are looking secure – and are currently rising rapidly.

Turning to the detail:

- Perceptions of current personal financial situations fell 9 points to -25%, a fresh low this cycle.
- A net 1% expect to be better off this time next year, little changed.
- A net 17% of households think it's a bad time to buy a major household item, up 8. This is still very low, but is well off its May trough of -30.
- Perceptions regarding the economic outlook in 12 months' time improved from -43% to -35%. The five-year-ahead measure lifted from -5% to +2%.
- House price inflation expectations were little changed at 0.9%.
- CPI inflation expectations held up, at 5% versus 4.9% last month.

When it comes to the question of whether it's a good time to buy a major household item (historically the best spending indicator in the survey), a gap has opened up between respondents who have mortgages and those without. That makes intuitive sense – if a households' mortgage payments have not yet gone up, they probably will soon. But less intuitively, the group with mortgages are currently less pessimistic about the change in their personal financial situations versus a year ago (-18 for those with mortgages vs -28 for those without). This may reflect that this is undoubtedly a higher-income group on average, meaning the increase in the cost of necessities has been more manageable.

In order to get inflation down, the Reserve Bank requires consumption to slow markedly from its previous trend. The unexpectedly large fall in retail sales in Q2 (figure 3) suggests that is starting to happen, though the data is still extremely volatile due to COVID disruptions. Although the cost of living is much higher (with CPI inflation at 7.3% y/y in June), QES average hourly earnings were up 7% in the same 12 months. That's a huge offset. The outlook for wages will be critical in determining whether the OCR can indeed stop at 4% or whether it needs to keep going.

On the inflation front, consumer inflation expectations remain far too high at 5%, but are at least well off their peak. In a super-tight labour market, workers' inflation expectations could well feed into wage demands – and wage outcomes. We expect the RBNZ to keep on with its plan to raise the OCR in 50bp steps in the remaining two meetings this year.
