Traction meets supply recovery

The bottom line

The Q3 Quarterly Survey of Business Opinion (QSBO) suggested monetary tightening is getting traction and that supply constraints are easing. Firms are now finding it easier to get labour, and pricing and cost measures are easing. While that's great news, the survey is still downbeat overall, with many activity indicators still sub-par, costs still elevated, and the general business situation still dire at -53.

- Activity indicators were mixed, with experienced trading activity a little more negative in the past quarter. Expected activity improved and investment intentions lifted (both are still very soft).
- Pricing and cost indicators remain elevated, but fell in Q3. Experienced prices, which had been hovering near their peak, fell markedly. Expected prices were little changed.
- Employers are much more positive this quarter about the labour market. Both skilled and unskilled labour are much easier to find and hiring intentions have lifted.
- Labour as a limiting factor on production eased further and is now around pre-Covid levels, indicating that between monetary tightening and migration, the labour market has cooled. However, there is still a way-to-go until employment is at a level that puts downwards pressure on core inflation.
- Capacity utilisation remained subdued. NZIER puts this down to "large firms' ability to increase output without incurring an increase in unit costs".

Overall, the survey suggests monetary tightening is working, and that strong migration is helping to reduce pressure in the labour market, but there's still a way to go.

Key points

- Q3 business sentiment lifted slightly. But as in recent quarters, these data still make for a sombre reading, with 53% of businesses still pessimistic (Q2: 60%).

- Experienced domestic trading activity (DTA) fell 2 points on a seasonally adjusted basis to -17. As in Q2, that's very much consistent with sub-par growth (historical average: +10). On face value, these data suggest some downside risk to our GDP forecast, but it's important to note that this indicator has been on the pessimistic side of GDP lately. Expected trading activity (for the next three months) rose from -17% to -14%, better but still suggesting underlying economic momentum remains weak.

- The residential investment pipeline is improving. Interestingly, next quarter output for builders is back at its long-run average and numbers employed is over 20 points above its long-run average, indicating that the upswing in house prices is having an impact. However, experienced new orders remain subdued at -24, indicating this slightly better tone isn't occurring yet.
- Employment and hiring intentions remained in positive territory, presumably fuelled by improved labour availability. A net 1% of firms reported increasing headcount in Q3, versus a net 5% of firms reporting an increase in Q2. This remains above the long-run average of -4%. Hiring intentions had a moderate lift to a net 12% of firms expecting to hire next quarter (Q2: 4%). The ease of finding skilled (-8%) and unskilled (7%) labour improved in the quarter. This will also be welcome news for the RBNZ given that it needs to see the imbalance between labour supply and demand dissipate for an extended period before it can be confident that the wage-price spiral has been squashed.

- Labour as a limiting factor eased to 18%, around its pre-COVID level (figure 4). As with other aspects of this survey, this is heading in the right direction, but it's more about how long it will take get to a level that is disinflationary. Sales as a limiting factor rose to 48 (from 42), around pre-pandemic levels. Echoing our comments last quarter, these data are a long way from signalling 'job done' on the inflation front, but there is at least some evidence here that monetary tightening is getting traction and that strong net migration is easing pressure in the labour market.

Source: NZIER, Macrobond, ANZ Research

- Pricing and cost indicators are falling, albeit slowly Past-quarter costs and selling prices both fell (from 70% to 68%, and from 70% to 56% respectively), but remain elevated. It's a similar story for next-quarter price and cost expectations.

- Profitability remains subdued, but improved in Q3. Profitability increased, with experienced profits rising from a net -50% to -34% and expected profits rising from a net -46% to -26%. Meanwhile, capacity utilisation remained weak, with NZIER chalking this up to large firms, noting they have been able to increase production by as much as 20% without additional unit costs. This is consistent with labour as a limiting factor easing (reflecting migration-induced labour supply).

All up, today's data suggest the RBNZ's monetary tightening to date is getting traction and that migration-induced labour supply is having a big impact. While capacity and inflation indicators improved, there are still questions around whether the economy is slowing sufficiently to get inflation down in a reasonable time frame. If we are indeed past the worst of the slowdown, as some of today's data might suggest, then the RBNZ may not be getting the traction it thought it was getting back in August. A premature reacceleration in activity and therefore inflation pressures will be a big worry for the RBNZ. But for now, the overall read from the QSBO is that things are moving in the right direction. Even though, the RBNZ will be very aware of the dangers of assuming a straight-line extrapolation from here. As we've said previously, getting headline inflation to slow from over 7% y/y to around 5% should prove relatively easy. Getting it to the 2% target midpoint (and driving sticky domestic inflation lower) is likely to be more of a challenge.
