The R word

Key points

- The steady improvement in consumer confidence over recent months took a blow this month.
- ANZ-Roy Morgan consumer confidence fell 9 points in March to 86.4, with a fall across most questions, likely affected by recession headlines. Late-month responses were markedly weaker than those that preceded the GDP data.
- Inflation expectations were unchanged at 4.5%, while expected house price inflation fell from 4.1% to 3.4%. This series has no predictive power for house prices, but is a lens on the "wealth effect" on spending.

Turning to the detail (for charts see page 5):

- The future conditions index made up of forward-looking questions fell 8 points to 93, while the current conditions index fell 9 points to 76.
- Perceptions of current personal financial situations fell 11 points to -23%, back where it was in September last year.
- A net 19% expect to be better off this time next year, up 1 point.
- A net 24% think it's a bad time to buy a major household item, down 6 points, bringing to an end a steady run of improvement.
- Perceptions regarding the economic outlook in 12 months' time dropped a sharp 14 points to -34%. The 5-year-ahead measure dropped 10 points to -5%.
- House price inflation expectations fell from 4.1% to 3.4% y/y. They are strongest in Canterbury (3.9%) and weakest in the rest of the South Island (2.7%).
- Two-year-ahead CPI inflation expectations were unchanged at 4.5%.

News that the economy re-entered recession in the second half of last year appears to have hit consumer confidence hard (figure 1). Only around half of the week 4 survey responses will have come in after GDP data was released on 21 March, but the responses for that week overall were notably lower. That said, the preceding weeks were also softer than February, so the monthly fall in confidence isn't just about recession headlines.

Indeed, while the GDP data has likely caused some volatility in surveyed confidence, in the bigger picture, the economy really struggled in the second half of last year, especially on a per capita basis, and the labour market is increasingly showing the impact of that. And for the majority of people, the labour market is the business cycle: wage increases, job security, the ease of finding a new job – and all are heading south. And even if in GDP terms the economy is now past the worst, as we expect it is, the labour market will continue to soften for some time yet, given the usual lags in the dynamics between overall activity and the labour market.

Consumers continue to report ongoing extreme wariness about purchasing major household items (figure 3). This perception has been strongly inversely correlated with inflation in recent years, to the extent of breaking the usual reliable relationship with retail sales. To be sure, retail sales have been very weak, ask any shopkeeper, but the fall in this indicator was extreme as inflation took off.

Household inflation expectations are well off their highs, but remain much higher than pre-COVID levels and at 4.5% are hardly screaming "job done". Household inflation expectations are of secondary importance insofar as households don't set prices, but they can impact wage demands (less relevant now the labour market is so much less tight) and the ease with which businesses can pass cost increases though into their prices.

Finally, despite the fall in consumer confidence this month, at least we're still ahead of Australia. That's something.
