Key points

- ANZ-Roy Morgan Consumer Confidence rose 5 points to 98.3 in April, shoring up the upward trend that was starting to look wobbly.
- The proportion of households thinking it's a good time to buy a major household item (the best retail indicator) rose 5 points, but at -11 it's still nothing flash.
- Inflation expectations soared 0.5pts to 4.7%, the highest reading since July 2023. It may be related to global tariff talk, but since New Zealand is not putting on new tariffs, global developments are unlikely to be inflationary here.

Turning to the detail:

- The future conditions index made up of forward-looking questions rose 4 points to 105.2. The current conditions index lifted 6 points to 88.0.
- Perceptions of current personal financial situations rose 8 points to -13%.
- A net 23% expect to be better off this time next year, up 7 points.
- A net 11% think it's a bad time to buy a major household item, an improvement of 5 points.
- Perceptions regarding the economic outlook in 12 months' time rose 4 points to -16%. The 5-year-ahead measure rose from 6% to 9%.
- House price inflation expectations were steady at 3.4% y/y.
- Two-year-ahead CPI inflation expectations jumped from 4.2% to 4.7%, the highest read in nearly two years.
- For charts see page 4.

Consumer confidence rose 5 points in April, with a broad-based lift across the component questions. The most telling question for retailers is whether people think it's a good time to buy a major household item. While it did improve, figure 2 shows that it's still a long way from suggesting good times for the retail sector.

Household inflation expectations soared in April, surprisingly. Household inflation expectations matter less for the inflation outlook than the expectations of those who actually directly set prices, and figure 3 shows that the relationship with actual CPI inflation is loose. But all else equal, when household are expecting high inflation, that can boost wage demands and make it easier than otherwise for firms to raise their prices. The jump could be due to the impact of lots of talk about global tariffs being inflationary. New Zealand is not imposing any new tariffs, however, and our take is that the tariffs will actually result in lower inflation in New Zealand, primarily due to weaker global growth (though how the NZD reacts will matter a lot too).

The view

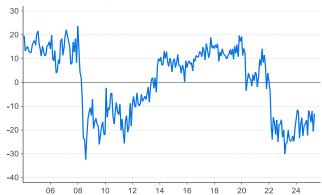

It's good to see that New Zealand consumers so far appear to be relatively unfazed by the recent bout of global volatility. The economy is turning higher (albeit slowly), and interest rates are lower. In the bigger picture, though, consumer confidence remains subdued, and this is dampening the outlook for the retail sector. We've recently revised down our forecasts for growth on an assumption that firms will be less willing to take risks with global dark clouds hovering. But the silver lining for consumers is that we have also added two more 25bp cuts to the Official Cash Rate into our forecasts in order to offset that, which households with significant debt would be very glad to see.
